

I understand that the FCC is trying to limit choice in the United States of America by taking away a service from XM radio. If FM/AM radio want customers to listen to their stations and increase revenues then they need to supply a better product. Not limit a competitor with a superior product for no other reason than they fear competition.

Competition should make the competitors more competitive, not run to the FCC to protect their bad product.

There is not a problem with radio. The reason satellite customers become satellite customers is because they LOVE radio, but their local market has been extremely disappointing, boring and often trite.

What I see is the FCC trying to protect a bad product instead of allowing competition to improve all products.

I can not wait until the day XM adds Nashville to their cities for weather and traffic so I no longer have to listen to the local stations that rarely offers any good music or news content.
